Representative Matters

- Nahal represented a construction company that was being sued by a company that had provided the doors and other materials for our client's project. The company that provided the materials was alleging breach of contract and placed a lien on our client's property. We were able to reach a settlement and had the case dismissed in a very short time, at a very cost to the client.
- Represented a client who was involved with a dispute with his former employer. The employer was alleging that the former employee was violating non-compete agreements as well as other employment agreements. We were able to quickly resolve the issues and obtain a favorable outcome for the client so that he could resume his work with the new employer.
- Nahal assisted Mark Kimball with a dispute involving a real estate purchase and sale. After our client sold her property, the buyers were alleging fraudulent concealment based on Form 17. We were able to show that the buyers were on notice of the defects which prevented the buyers from further pursuing their claims. The purchasers were persuaded to not file a lawsuit.
